AI and the Future of Construction

AI is rapidly reshaping construction, helping teams work safer, faster and with far less waste. As projects grow more complex, AI can cut errors, prevent accidents and optimise materials while skilled people remain at the heart of every build.

But even the smartest tech only works when paired with reliable, high-quality on-site essentials. That's where Bryson comes in. From PPE to fixings to temporary protection, we support contractors with the products that keep AI-enabled sites running safely and efficiently.

PPE Standards

You Need to Know in 2026: Helmets, Footwear & Eyewear

PPE standards are evolving fast. New testing methods, updated classifications and modernised certification mean contractors need to stay alert to what's changing, and when. Here's a quick overview of the key updates coming into effect for helmets, footwear and eyewear in 2026, with a link to the full guide if you want to dive deeper.

Safety Helmets

EN 397 is being updated to EN 397:2025 from April 2026, introducing clearer performance levels: :

- Type 1: On-crown impact protection
- Type 2: On-crown + off-crown impact protection

Chinstrap forces, electrical insulation testing and accessory compatibility have all been modernised, with items like visors and ear defenders now tested with the helmet.

EN 12492 remains the standard for height and rope-access work, offering higher chinstrap strength and side-impact protection.

Protective Eyewear:

EN 166 > EN ISO 16321

EN 166, safety eyewear is transitioning to EN ISO 16321, by November 2025. The new standard introduces:

- More realistic impact and optical testing
- Multiple headform sizes for better fit
- Improved global consistency

Safety Footwear:

EN ISO 20345:2022

This standard defines minimum performance requirements for safety footwear, including:

- 200-joule toe protection & Sole durability
- Compression resistance
- Slip resistance & Water penetration

Updated PPE standards help ensure equipment performs reliably on site, reducing injuries, improving comfort and strengthening compliance. Staying ahead of these changes also helps contractors avoid downtime, failed audits and unnecessary risk. Bryson continually reviews its PPE range to ensure every helmet, boot and eyewear product meets the latest certification.
